

N.B. trial conducted in wrong language:

Description

It isn't always the right to be served in French that is lacking ... sometimes it's the right to be served in English.

N.B. trial conducted in wrong language: 'It sounds like a Monty Python movie'

THE CANADIAN PRESS
Published Friday, February 24, 2017 11:47AM AST
Last Updated Monday, February 27, 2017 7:31AM AST

FREDERICTON — A New Brunswick court has set aside a woman’s drug trafficking conviction after her trial was mistakenly conducted in French for no apparent reason.

“I hate to say it, but it sounds like a Monty Python movie,” said John McEvoy, a law professor at the University of New Brunswick.

The provincial Court of Appeal ordered a new trial for Neisha Petitpas, who was convicted of possession of oxycodone and cocaine for the purpose of trafficking in October 2014.

The appeal ruling said that at her first court appearance, Petitpas clearly indicated through her counsel that she wanted to proceed in English.

It said initial proceedings were held in English, but at some point proceedings in Court of Queen’s Bench switched to French.

“For reasons that are not obvious from the record, the proceedings were conducted entirely in French,” the Feb. 23 decision said.

The decision said the Criminal Code states that Petitpas had the right to be tried in the language of her choice.

“There is no doubt there has been, in this case, a violation of (the Criminal Code). Ms. Petitpas’ choice of language was disregarded,” it said.

“There should have been an order that the matter be tried before a judge who spoke Ms. Petitpas’ chosen language and the requirements of (the Criminal Code) should have been followed. These requirements were wholly ignored.”

McEvoy called it a “very unusual” situation.

He said it’s impossible to surmise why the language suddenly switched to French without knowing the details of the case, but he said he believes the law society and other legal bodies will likely be looking into the scenario.

“I suspect they’ll want to make sure this kind of thing doesn’t happen again,” he said. “We all have obligations to see rights respected.”

— By Aly Thomson in Halifax.

http://atlantic.ctvnews.ca/n-b-trial-conducted-in-wrong-language-it-sounds-like-a-monty-python-movie-1.3299771#_gus&_gucid=&_gup=Facebook&_gsc=Ugzp8IR

Category

1. News
2. Uncategorized

Date Created

2017-04-05

default watermark